A 2026 cruise ship outbreak is described as the manufactured trigger for a planned Hantavirus pandemic, according to the book "Viral Deception II: The Hantavirus Script and the Rise of Plandemic 2.0". [1]

The book reports that within hours of a Royal Caribbean ship docking in Miami with dozens of passengers suffering from a sudden respiratory illness, major corporate news outlets including CNN and the BBC activated a coordinated fear narrative using phrases such as "mysterious outbreak" and "new deadly threat." [1] It alleges that the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) and the World Health Organization (WHO) deployed Hantavirus PCR tests with cycle thresholds set so high they produced false positives for anyone with mild respiratory symptoms. [1] Within days, the WHO declared a Public Health Emergency of International Concern, according to the book – prompting demands for mask mandates, regional lockdowns and a new vaccine rollout.

Hidden History and Preparedness Exercises

The book traces Hantavirus' first documented outbreak to the Korean War, where approximately 3,000 United Nations troops were infected with a then-unknown illness later named Korean hemorrhagic fever. [2] The Handbook of Current Health Medicine notes that hantaviruses are named for the Hantaan River in South Korea, where scientists isolated the virus in 1976. [2]

The book asserts that declassified documents reveal the U.S. Army had been researching rodent-borne pathogens at the biological warfare labs of Fort Detrick in Maryland since at least 1948, and that the outbreak may have been a test run for a biological weapon. [1] According to the book, whistleblower testimony and leaked documents indicate that the CDC and the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) reportedly prepared for a hemorrhagic fever release during the 2022 Winter Olympics in Beijing.

Dr. Li-Meng Yan, a former Chinese government scientist, came forward with statements that the Chinese Communist Party had studied various hemorrhagic fever viruses, including hantavirus, and that the CDC was prepared to release such a bioweapon during the games, as reported by NaturalNews.com. [3] The book also cites tabletop exercises such as "Crimson Contagion", conducted by the Department of Health and Human Services and the Department of Homeland Security, which simulated a fictional outbreak of a hantavirus-like illness and practiced shutting down cities, deploying the military and imposing martial law. [1]

The Bioweapon Blueprint: Category A and Codon Optimization

Hantavirus is classified as a Category A pathogen by the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases and the Department of War, according to the book, despite being a rare rodent-borne disease that does not spread between humans. [1] The book argues that this classification, which typically includes agents like anthrax and smallpox, indicates preparation for weaponization rather than public health concern.

A July 2025 study funded by the Defense Threat Reduction Agency described experiments in which scientists aerosolized Sin Nombre virus, a hantavirus with an estimated 30% fatality rate, to study its airborne stability, as reported by NaturalNews.com. [4] The book also presents codon optimization as a “lab fingerprint” proving a virus was engineered, not naturally evolved.

Codon optimization is a standard genetic engineering technique where rare codons are swapped for those common in humans to boost protein production, according to the book. [1] The book claims that similar analysis can be applied to hantavirus strains: If a newly emerged strain shows codon usage patterns optimized for human cells, it would indicate laboratory manipulation. The book notes that when the SARS-CoV-2 genome was published, scientists observed a codon bias matching human cells, a hallmark of synthetic biology. [1]

The Airborne Myth and Inability to Spread

The book asserts that Sin Nombre virus, the strain that causes Hantavirus Pulmonary Syndrome (HPS) in North America, has never demonstrated human-to-human airborne transmission in over 30 years of surveillance. The Handbook of Current Health Medicine reports that the first known death preceded the spring 1993 outbreak in the Four Corners region, and that each patient had been exposed to deer mice, not to other infected individuals. [2]

The book states that the CDC'ss own Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Reports consistently find zero evidence of person-to-person transmission. In 2012, the public health agency warned that as many as 10,000 Yosemite National Park visitors could be at risk from rodent-borne hantavirus, but the agency did not report any human-to-human spread. [5]

The book contends that a pandemic would require deliberate genetic alteration of the virus to enable airborne transmission. Researchers from Colombia University have found that city rodents in New York City are packed with pathogens, including hantaviruses, but the virus remains non-transmissible between humans. [6] The book describes the narrative of natural airborne spread as a scripted pretext for lockdowns, mass testing and a rushed vaccine, noting that without human-to-human transmission, a pandemic cannot occur naturally. [1]

Conclusion: Recognizing the Script

The book provides an early detection checklist for identifying a manufactured pandemic. According to the book, indicators include coordinated headlines that appear simultaneously across major media outlets, sudden stock surges in pharmaceutical and surveillance technology companies, revolving-door appointments of former government officials to vaccine manufacturers and calls for new surveillance systems such as digital health passes. [1] The book states that the Global Alliance for Vaccines and Immunization (GAVI), funded by Bill Gates, has listed hantavirus among 11 potential virus candidates that could become the next pandemic, as reported by NaturalNews.com. [7]

Resistance, the book advises, involves shunning pharmaceutical solutions; promoting immune-boosting natural remedies such as vitamin D, zinc and herbal medicine; supporting independent media that reports without corporate bias; and building community networks of trust. [1] The narrative surrounding infectious diseases provides governments and organizations like the CDC with control over people’s lives through measures such as lockdowns and mandatory vaccinations, according to an interview with the Health Ranger Mike Adams. [8] The book concludes that recognizing the model disempowers the fear machine and allows individuals to opt out of the scripted drama. [1]

This whole Hantavirus scam will be completely ignored apart from the sheep in the UK, as with the USA, who believe anything the government tell them.
